

“Brick walls are there for a reason: they let us prove how badly we want things.” This was a really interesting line from the beginning of the lecture. I thought about it a lot and I’ve had a decent amount of these in my life, and finding your way around or through them is its own kind of journey. Getting to your goal is great, but finding out how you deal with challenges and how determined you are to get to that goal is important. I think it’s also really important to note that he didn’t achieve all of his goals at a young age, it took him years to get there and that’s something I’ve been struggling with recently.

I think the most inspiring thing for me was the part where he talks about enabling other people’s dreams. It’s always been important to me to help other people whenever possible, and this lecture allowed me to recognize that I’ve had that same hand extended to me. I have wanted to help give people a way to achieve their dreams, and this talk made me realize I can help with that in small ways.

There were also a lot of good points about learning to work with people, being a good person in general, and realizing you can reach your goals. It was a really amazing lecture and I’m glad I watched it. As I mentioned earlier I’ve been struggling with the feeling that I need to have everything figured out by the time I graduate and then I don’t have many years after that to have everything be stable. I keep reminding myself that my life is not over when I turn 30 and I have so much time to find out who I am and get my feet under myself and achieve my goals.
